Management's discussion of fund performance

What factors influenced results

The U.S. economy grew at a steady pace, driven by strong consumer and government spending, and a healthy labor market. U.S. inflation eased through most of the year, then rose modestly as the Federal Reserve cut interest rates three times beginning in September. Growth stocks lifted U.S. markets for most of the period but sold off in early 2025 after Chinese startup DeepSeek released an artificial intelligence model that rivaled those of U.S. technology giants, despite reportedly mixing powerful chips with less advanced ones.

Within the fund, most sectors generated positive returns. Communication services, financials, utilities and information technology rose the most. Within communication services, holdings in select social media and digital streaming companies supported results. The industrials and consumer discretionary sectors also rose, though they lagged the portfolio's overall return.

Conversely, the materials and real estate sectors declined. Materials stocks were affected by concerns about weak economic growth in China, while certain real estate investment trusts declined as investors dialed back expectations for interest rate cuts.
